

PORTFOLIO DEFINITION

In order to provide a "Moderate" approach to equity investment, we manage a portfolio with a minimum of 40% equity exposure and a maximum of 70% equity exposure. When our conviction in broad equity markets is high, our exposure is likely to be at the upper end of this range. The remainder of the portfolio allocation will be made up from diversifying asset classes such as global government bonds, cash, corporate credit and alternative investments. The benchmark for this portfolio net return is Consumer Price Index Inflation plus 1.5% per annum, viewed over a rolling three year cycle. Our comparator benchmark is ARC Sterling Balanced PCI, made up of a peer group of wealth managers.

PORTFOLIO COMMENTARY

After a strong start to 2025, February reminded investors that markets rarely move in straight lines. The narrative of US economic exceptionalism, so dominant in recent months, lost some of its lustre. Growing concerns around the administration's policy direction weighed on corporate and consumer sentiment, reviving questions about growth sustainability. We have previously flagged that we anticipated weakness in US equities, and have positioned portfolios accordingly.

For multi-asset investors, the silver lining in February came from global bonds. Despite tariff concerns and inflation prints that were firmer than expected, bond markets looked past the near-term noise and focused on rising growth risks. Bond yields declined, allowing the Amundi Global Aggregate Bond ETF to return 1.2% in February.

Corporate credit held up well, with strong fundamentals keeping investment grade spreads in check, helping the Vanguard Global Credit Bond fund to a 1.6% gain. Importantly, we selected Sterling-hedged share classes for these positions, ensuring they were not dragged down by the weaker dollar, which fell 1% versus Sterling.

Our third pillar of diversifying assets, Liquid Alternatives, continued to deliver strong performance. Our decision in late 2024 to increase exposure to alternatives reflected our belief that US trade tariffs were underestimated by markets. That thesis remains intact, and the AQR Apex fund delivered a 2% gain for the month.

US equities struggled under the weight of mega-cap tech concerns, while European markets took the lead. European equities outperformed the US and finished the month as the strongest major equity market. As investors increasingly priced in a possible ceasefire in Ukraine, more positive sentiment benefited our allocation to the SPDR S&P Euro Dividend Aristocrats ETF (+1.4%). UK equities also posted positive returns, with the Schroder UK Equity Income Maximiser gaining 1.3%. Our core global equity allocation, the JPM Global Equity Premium Income, posted a solid 2.7% gain, demonstrating the value of a more defensive stance. Asian equities advanced in February, led by China, where enthusiasm around DeepSeek continued to bolster sentiment in the tech sector. However, Japan stood out as an exception, with the Amundi Prime Japan ETF falling 2.7%. The yen's strong appreciation weighed on this currency-sensitive market.

February's market action reinforced some key lessons. Investors have started to question US growth risks and whether high earnings expectations and elevated valuations remain justifiable. European equities' strength underscored the value of regional diversification, while positive fixed-income returns reaffirmed that bonds can act as effective diversifiers against equity volatility. Our positioning has limited exposure to large US growth stocks while maintaining meaningful allocations to defensive assets like bonds, credit and alternatives. As we have seen many times before, in an uncertain environment, diversification and discipline provide the solid foundations for investment returns.
